Acquired by the MNA in 1989 and funded by the estate of William J. Kernan, Jr., the Phillips Family Memorial Nature Sanctuary is home to many rare and unusual plants. Coastal plain marsh communities are uncommon in Michigan, and Phillips Family Memorial Nature Sanctuary is one of three MNA sanctuaries protecting coastal plain marshes.

Many of the rare plants that grow here are known as coastal plain disjunct plants. These plants are separated by hundreds of miles from their main populations along the Atlantic and Gulf Coasts, where these plants are more common. It is believed that these species arrived in Michigan approximately 11,000 years ago as the last glaciation receded, and were deposited in southwest Michigan as a result of a drainage channel down the Hudson River connecting with the Atlantic coastal plain.

Disjunct plants that can be found at Phillips Family Memorial Nature Sanctuary include bald-rush, seedbox, and tall beak-rush—a few of the 40 different disjunct species that only grow in Michigan's coastal plains. Virginia meadow beauty is a striking special-concern species found in the sanctuary; it can be identified by its showy pink-purple petals and contrasting yellow anthers.

The disjunct plant species and coastal plain marsh community make Phillips Family Memorial Nature Sanctuary a must-see for those who want to experience a truly distinctive part of southwestern Michigan.

The Virginia meadow beauty

Typically found in high-quality natural areas, the Virginia meadow beauty (Rhexia virginica) adds striking color to the vegetative species in the marsh. The Virginia meadow beauty can be identified by its bright purple or deep pink flowers that produce eight stamens with orange-yellow anthers. The flowers have four wide-spreading petals that span up to one inch across. The blooming period lasts one to two months and occurs from mid-summer to early fall. Virginia meadow beauties thrive in wet depressions, sandy swamps, and soggy marshes, such as the habitat found at Phillips Family Memorial Nature Sanctuary.

Hardwoods in the uplands

The forested uplands surrounding the coastal plain marsh provide an interesting mixture of disjunct species, remnants of historic oak barrens once located here, and the southern mesic forest they have become. Black gum, red maple, pin oak, and black cherry are just some of the hardwoods that inhabit the sanctuary. Portions of the walking trail may become impassable during high seasonal water periods, but the eastern part of the trail is usually clear, and benches along the way provide a pleasant resting place to observe the woods.
